PREFACE.

THE Editor was induced to undertake the compilation of the following Work from upwards of twenty-five years experience of the difficulty that besets a Sportsman in finding the exact locality of, and nearest route to, the Fixtures, when inclined to visit a Hunt in which he is a stranger, and for the convenience also of those who are only partially acquainted with the country in which they may be sojourning. The temptation to try the pace of other Hounds than those we have been accustomed to has not been diminished by the development of Railways. On the contrary, the facilities they offer to forward horses into the heart of the best Hunting Countries are readily accepted, and to Railways is in some measure to be charged the necessity of a Work of this nature.

Imagine a lover of the "Noble Science" from the North established at his Inn in some terra incognita of the West. He finds the Fixture of the day, and applies to those about him for a description of the locality. Perhaps he gets it, perhaps he does not, or he may succeed in realising only a certain amount of information. With that he goes on his way, but the description is so bad, and the directions so devious and uncertain, that he soon doubts whether he is pursuing the nearest route, and lost time, and lost temper, to say nothing of going over twice the ground necessary, are the result, for it is astonishing how little knowledge of these matters people possess in country towns. This the Editor has not unfrequently experienced, and resorted to the only alleviation in such cases—"grin and bear it;" but as it was sorrowful comfort at the best, he has undertaken the task of procuring the Places of Meeting of the principal Hunts in England and Wales, and by the assistance of Masters of Hounds, Friends, and others, and the necessary Statistical Authorities, has been able to give such a description of each Place of Meeting, with its distance from the nearest towns, as he trusts will save other Sportsmen the like most uncomfortable solace. He has likewise added a list of Inns at which proper accommodation for Hunters can be procured, a matter of no small importance to a stranger, who can thus name his Inn and send his groom forward with the horses without misgiving or hesitation.

In the prosecution of his somewhat tedious work, the Editor has to thank many Friends and Masters of Hounds for kindness and urbanity in affording him information, for which he expresses his best thanks; and if there be any inaccuracies or change in any Hunt that come more immediately under their notice, and they will kindly take the trouble to inform him of them, he will be most happy to correct them.

In describing the position of the Fixtures, when the expression "right" or "left of the road" is used, it implies that they are so situate as respects the first town from which the distance is stated. By the term "cross road," is meant the distance computed by the nearest route, which may not on all occasions be favorable for wheels, but it is not invariably to be understood that some direct road does not lead to the Place of Meeting by another more distant route.

As it frequently happens that no correct authority can be obtained for the distances of Places of Meeting by cross roads, the distances are computed as nearly as can be done without admeasurement, and are generally calculated rather above than under the actual distances, in order that a Sportsman may not be disappointed by having farther to ride to Covert than he expected.

As changes occasionally take place in the boundaries of Hunting Countries, it may happen that some of the Places of Meeting may not be found in the list of a particular Hunt to which such Fixtures have been added, but by reference to the adjoining Hunt, from which the Fixtures have been derived, the one required will in all probability be found.

In compiling this Work every care has been taken to render the lists of Places of Meeting as ample, correct, and complete as possible, but as new Fixtures are sometimes adopted, the omission of such cannot be avoided.
